NON-ALPHABETIC AND SUBJECTIVE GLOSSARY FOR THE EXHIBITION LA HUACA PLEURE (THE HUACA WEEPS)

THE HUACAS

Huaca is a term derived from the Quechua and Aymara word wak'a, which, in modern Peruvian usage, refers to Pre-Columbian ruins, temples, pyramids and necropolises.

Before the Spanish conquest, the word designated any sacred space or object, whether a temple, mountain, lake or boulder, but could also denote certain categories of objects, such as huacos (ceramic pieces used for rituals) and ancestral or other mummies.

Huacas are considered people, "beings other than humans", with which Andean peoples maintain a reciprocal relationship, thus expanding the Western ontology of the sacred and undermining the modernist separation between nature and culture, human and non-human, animate and inanimate, etc.

THE HUAQUEROS

The term huagueros, derived from the word huaca, can be translated as grave robbers. Traditional huaqueros, as opposed to pillagers from big cities, are usually members of a rural community with direct access to pre-Columbian ruins. Their practice is inscribed in a web of relationships such that they are considered special intermediaries between the community and its ancestors, the living and the dead. They are considered "local experts about the past" who possess an alternative knowledge about archaeological sites and the artifacts they seek, as well as ritual practices mean to obtain the favour of a huaca, which is considered a living being itself, one that can be generous but also potentially dangerous.

Most huaqueros have other, often temporary, day jobs, as field hands, construction workers or fishermen. Huaqueo is not their sole means of subsistence. Sometimes they sell the artefacts they dig up to dealers who resell them to bigcity collectors. After their illicit excavations, often huaqueros seek to have themselves "cleansed" by a local curandero (shaman). In exchange for his or her services, they give the curandero one or two huacos to use as part of their practice as healers.

The excavated and exchanged object thus recovers its agency in the circuit of rituals that arose in the centuries after it was buried, an alternative to the circuits of anthropology museums and illegal trafficking.

Furthermore, it's not unusual for huaqueros to accumulate small-scale collections, called huacotecas, whether personal or belonging to the community.

THE HUACOS

The term huacos refers to pre-Columbian ritual ceramics that anthropologists have extensively studied and historically sequenced.

Pre-Columbian Peru had a rich tradition of making fabrics and ceramics now found in museum anthropological collections and private holdings. Along with other precious artifacts (like metal pieces and fabrics) they are the contents of pre-Columbian tombs that attract huaqueros and archaeologists alike. They are also coveted by dealers and pre-Columbian art collectors. As a result of their complex "social life", they are sometimes included in mesas curanderas (group healing ceremonies) held by curanderos (shamans) where they are prized for the agency arising from the "cumulative charge" acquired in the huacas and their connectivity with the pre-Hispanic past.

THE BAQUETA

A baqueta is a tool wielded by huaqueros to probe the ground in a search for pre-Columbian graves and the artifacts buried in them. It is a long, tapered steel rod with a t-shaped handle, made by local metalworkers from repurposed construction materials.

THE BOLO DE COCA

A bolo de coca is a cud of coca leaves chewed by huaqueros as an energizer as well as to reduce hunger and thirst while doing difficult labour in a desert climate. The leaves are chewed for a long time until they form a kind of ball. The huaqueros also use coca leaves for divination, to find the graves in the huacas. The leaves are consumed along with tabaco, another plant considered sacred in the Andean tradition. People have also utilized coca for medical purposes since pre-Columbian times.

THE CURANDERO, OR CURANDERA

In Andean societies a curandero (or, if a woman, curandera) is a traditional healer or shaman. Their therapeutic practice takes into account the patient's place in the community. This approach is deeply rooted in pre-Columbian traditions involving the worship of huacas and the use of "master" or sacred (psychotropic) and medicinal plants.

The Catholic Inquisition repressed the curanderos in the name of "eradicating idolatry" among the Andean peoples, and this practice is still somewhat clandestine in Peru, relegated to isolated rural communities and urban shantytowns.

Contemporary curandero practice has absorbed Catholic culture and continually recasts it. This makes it an example of the syncretic forms produced by Andean peoples resisting colonial repression, an anthropophagy (or cultural cannibalism) in which colonialized peoples absorb the culture of the colonizers in order to keep their own culture alive, giving birth to a syncretic culture.

THE MESA CURANDERA

A mesa curandera is a secretly-held group healing session. It is an all-night affair led by a curandero (healer) who practices a vernacular variety of medicine rooted in pre-Columbian knowledge and based principally on the use of psychotropic plants (San Pedro cactuses, coca leaves), tabaco, fragrances and objects endowed with magic powers, whether huacos, stones taken from certain huacas, or images of particular Catholic saints such as Saint Cyprian and Saint Anthony.

The term mesa (table, in Spanish) also designates the ensemble of objects activated by a San Pedro cactus during the ceremony. Archeaological excavations have revealed that in Andean cosmology this inter-species relationship between the San Pedro cactus (huachuma in Quechua) and human beings extends back more than 3,000 years.
